1. Why you chose these specific questions?

Being a woman, I myself imagined that if I got a job how can I able to manage office work, house chores, upskilling along with taking care of my family. I have seen so many working women's who are struggling, juggling to manage office work, kids, family, house chores etc. They have no time for upskilling, that's why most of the women lost their jobs also facing so many problems in their health and personnel life too.

Overall, these questions were chosen to:

- Reflect practical daily decision-making
- Show priority-based thinking (urgent vs important)
- Highlight the balance between responsibilities and self-growth
- Represent the continuous cycle of work, home, and personal development

2. How you designed the branching — what trade-offs you made?

I designed the branching based on the priority and also the decision flow in the real life. Generally, everyone's daily routine is different, even every person's schedule may vary.

- The tree starts with urgent office work and urgent home chores because these are immediate responsibilities that usually cannot be delayed
- The branches move step by step shows how to manage the workload both in the office and home.
- Finally little energy and interest for the upskilling highlighted, creating a natural flow from morning to evening.

This thought made me to create a structured and logical decision tree with wide branches and leaves.

3. What psychological sources informed your design?

My decision tree design is based on psychological ideas like priority-based decision making, keeping decisions simple and energy management. It reflects how people can handle urgent tasks first and make choices based on their mental energy and daily schedules throughout the day. I gathered some information about human behaviour using Wikipedia to analyse the working women facing problems in a every day routine.

4.What you'd improve with more time?

In my decision tree, I have simply used yes/no branches but in real life decision making is so complex. I can improve by adding partial priorities to make decision in a simple way. I would also like to include additional factors such as stress management, child care and yoga to maintain good health also unexpected events, guests and improving the design to make it clearer and more flexible.

“Overall, this activity helped me to realize the importance of balance in daily life to become successful. Thank you, I really enjoyed working on this. This decision tree shows how thoughtful decisions can help to manage multiple responsibilities effectively without stress. Thank you for the opportunity”.
